New and huge challenges await for Europe. Brexit will change Europe. The discussion about the social repercussions of globalization and the improvement of the structures in the European Union push for changes that are not yet clearly recognizable. In addition, the foreseeable future the world of labour will change fundamentally for many due to technological developments.

Will there still be work for all in the future? How do we have to adjust our social system. How can education accompany these changes? Which opportunities for co-operation of labour in forging our social system are available, or must be created, so that the human scale is not lost. In view of these questions it is not an exaggeration to say that the legitimacy of the European Union is at stake when people have the strong feeling that social problems are not accounted for sufficiently. Only national actions will not enhance cohesion in Europe.

The 7th European Social Week (ESW) wants to contribute to making a next step in the formation of a social Europe. That which connects societies and brings them together should be central to the ESW. The social dialogue is an important element to which employees' organizations can make a big contribution. But they cannot be left alone with this task. Also the national governments and the European Institutions are urged to deliver their contribution. On the occasion of the 7th ESW we want to discuss the aspects of the future shape of Europe from ethical, economic, and social perspectives.

New work: which changes in the world of labour are coming up?

Fundamental technological changes will leave their imprint on the world of labour in the coming years. Will there be work for everyone? What is labour that fits humans? Which opportunities for co-operation and co-determination of these changes do workers have? How can technological progress serve ways to combine family life and occupation? What are workings when I work at home? Which training and education is necessary to keep me employable. What are the effects of changes in the system of social security? What about labour rights at the national and the European level?

Current state of affairs and new challenges for the social dialogue

Technological possibilities for structuring work are a given. But what does the reality for employees look like? The social dialogue is an important instrument for the co-operation of employees in the formation of the world of labour and beyond. For this, structural preconditions have to be created that make efficacious discussion of all involved possible. Who must contribute which part so that the social dialogue will be effective and efficient. What can we contribute?

A new European social order

The distribution of goods for the people of Europa, and for people elsewhere, is definitely unequal. This pertains to work, income, wealth, and thus to the well-being of people. Due to this, the chances for social participation are neither distributed justly. Politics and democratic forces in society have to work towards equality of chances with solutions that show solidarity. At the same time, reducing poverty and inequality can restore trust in the competence of those who make decisions. This is an important condition for the democratic development of our societies.
